Retail Market Austria Q1 2025

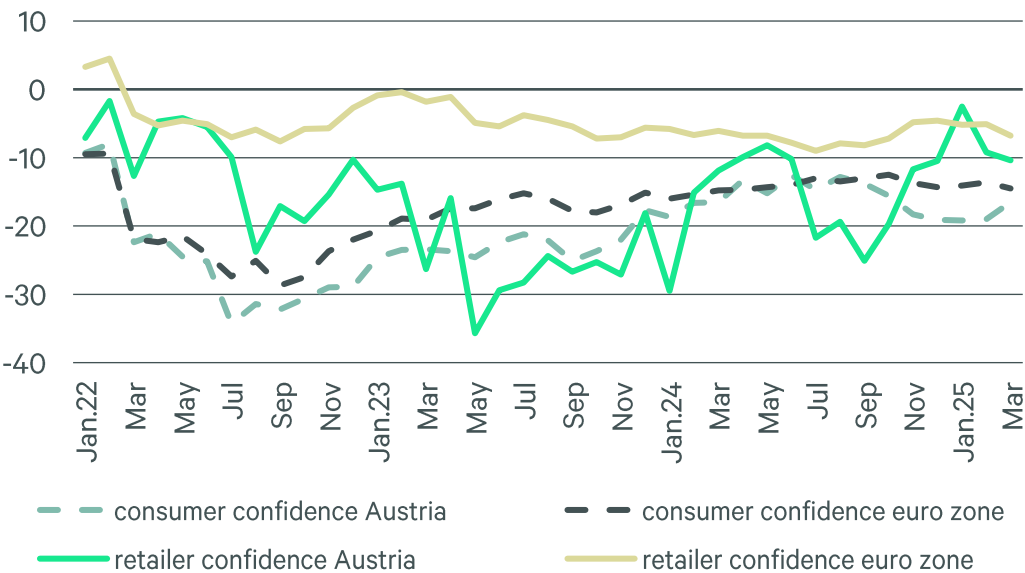

Arrows indicate changes to the quarter in the previous year.

Slight increase in retail sales and more investment momentum expected

- Adjusted for inflation, retail sales in Austrian retail rose slightly by 0.5% in 2024. While food and e-commerce are benefiting, the furniture and jewelry sectors in particular saw a decline. Profitability and therefore cost pressure remain key issues.
- Retailer confidence climbed briefly in February 2025, but was immediately dampened again in March. Both retailer and consumer confidence are below the EU average. Reluctance to spend and the savings rate remain high.
- The Austrian retail investment market got off to a subdued start in 2025. One retail property was traded in Vienna, but several major transactions involving shopping centers and retail parks are in preparation and already on the market, which is why more dynamic sales activity is expected over the course of the year.
- Possible distortions in the retail market in light of the current customs discussions remain to be seen. The extent of the impact on global supply chains and the retail companies that depend on them is difficult to predict for the time being. The uncertainties could lead to delays in rental decisions.

Market entries: luxury and gastronomy still on the rise

- Seven market entries are expected so far for 2025. Meanwhile, luxury remains on an expansion course: the US luxury eyewear brand Moscot has already opened in Vienna, while the Spanish fashion brand Loewe will open in the course of the year.
- In the mid-range fashion segment, the H&M label Arket is opening on Mariahilfer Strasse, as is the UOUOROSE concept on the same street.
- Non-food discounters are also continuing to expand: following the market exit of Pepco last year, Centershop from Germany will start its expansion into Austria in Parndorf in the spring of 2025.
- Food service concepts are also still in demand, with the French bakery chain Paul opening in Vienna in the spring.
- Outlook: A similarly high number of market entries is expected for 2025 as in previous years, as numerous concepts are exploring the Austrian market and are about to enter the market.
